Great Britain has under serious con-sideration a proposal that cotton shall be declared contraband of war and treat-ed as such by the allies. Authoritative information to this effect has been received by this government, although it was not transmitted through official

The action contemplated by Great Britain will be accompanied by an an-nouncement of a new policy that is un-derstood to be designed to have a quieting effect on the cotton raisers of the South and their representatives in Con-gress. It was stated in an authoritative quarter yesterday that if Great Britain places cotton on the contraband list, as now seems assured, she will make certain guarantees that will assure the stability lieved, would go a long way toward the nullification of the movement that is un-der way to force Congress to place an embargo as a measure of reprisal against England for her action in holding up cotprize courts.

As officials here view the situation Great Britain has a double purpose in her apparent determination to transfer cotton to the contraband list. In the first place she is said to be fearful that dis-satisfaction in the South over the prac-tical suspension of the cotton trade, due to the operation of the order in council, under which cotton destined for neutral countries to seized and referred to prize courts, might result in such a demand for an embargo on arms and ammunition that Congress might be unable to resist Secondly officials here believe that Great Britain apprehends that at the close of the war she may be a essed heavy damages by an international court by reason of her seizure of a product that she con-cedes is noncontraband of war.

Seek Firmer Legal Ground. The argument was made yesterday by officials here who sought to interpret Great Britain's contemplated change of policy as regards cotton that she has reached the conclusion she will stand on firmer legal grounds in defense when the time comes to settle up in an interna-tional court at the close of hostilities.

The first consideration is said to weigh more heavily with Great Pritain. From a legal point of view the status of cotton on the high seas would not be changed if declared contraband by the British. For all practical purposes the product is now contraband, as Great Georgetown University, will observe the Britain insists upon holding up cargoes on the plea that though consigned to not plea that though consigned to possible countries it is intended (or belliked).
